Griffith's books reveal how confronting understanding the human condition is & its incredibly insightful & helpful in relating it to my own life experiences. Yes immense insecurity lies in each of us & we are emotionally scarred wrecks & its compounding to the point where the planet won't cope with our insatiable need to validate ourselves, we're at breaking point, environmentally & mentally....

....Its been a tiring journey for humanity but now the human condition has been solved the door is wide open & you can leave it all behind as the only other option is terminal alienation & that is a dead end.

I thought it might help people to have some transcribe as its pretty long but I want people to be encouraged to watch on: "Thinking about the issue of the human condition has been far too depressing... we spend most of our time trying to avoid the damn thing... (1:40) The human condition arises from so called good and evil in our make up. We humans are capable of shocking acts like rape and murder but we've never been able to explain and thus understand why..."...

Pinker on the human condition is worth considering but Griffith's holds water and should be debated

You really make me think Sarah-interesting perspective and great insight on the human condition. I am off to watch other videos in this series.

I agree with your definition of the human condition. More people need to hear this series. You are right--Human behavior is very imperfect and that I feel is at the heart of everything.

It's not about being divine in the religious sense. The human condition is real but confronts us with the question 'are we good or bad?'. Humans are selfish & yet also incredibly selfless. As Griffith explains it's relieving to equate our aggression with the behaviour of less conscious animals who are driven by the biological need to reproduce—our anger & competitiveness is psychologically driven & is different to that of instinct driven animals.
